

» MILITARY

Airborne & Special Operations Museum, Fayetteville, North Carolina

Name: Hakim Isler
Age: 33

Wish you were here

Occupation: He owns Elite Training Center at 129 Hay St.

Family: Hanzo, a male, German shepherd
Hometown: New Brunswick, N.J.

How long have you been in Fayetteville? He came here with the Army in 2005. He left the Army in 2008.

We pictured you at the Airborne & Special Operations Museum. What about the museum would you recommend to visitors? I think it's very culturally and historically important. With Fort Bragg here, it really makes a statement. Some of the most elite warfighters in the United States of America have trained here. Getting to see the history of people who have bled and died for this country, trained and lived back then really makes a statement as to who we are as Americans. To me, all of the different branches are important. They all have a job to do or they wouldn't exist. The architecture of the building also tells a lot. When you look around Fayetteville, you don't see too many buildings like that. It's a special operation within its own design. The museum really does show the different facets of special operations. I recommend the museum to new people in town.